11. Any special instructions or concerns:

Your Will is an important legal document. The original should be kept in a safe place so it will not get lost or harmed by fire or weather, such as in a fireproof safe or a safe-deposit box.

You should leave readily available instructions for your executor(s) regarding the whereabouts of the original will. Specifically, you may want to include the following: (1) The exact location of the will. (2) Complete instructions for the burial/cremation (veterans may consider being buried in national cemeteries). (3) Exhaustive listing of friends, relatives, and others who should be contacted upon your death. (4) The exact location of all important documents, such as real estate deeds, divorce papers, birth certificate, any other legal documents and records. (5) Any information related to membership in societies, lodges, or other such organizations (Freemasons, for example). Many of them offer death benefits for named beneficiaries. (6) Where documents related to life insurance may be found, name of insurer(s), policy number(s), etc. (7) All bank account information, including the names of banks and account numbers. (8) A listing of any U.S. Savings Bonds (include names, denominations, and serial numbers). (9) A listing of any stocks or bonds (and where they can be found). (10) Any pension plan information. (11) Income tax returns from the past few years. (12) Location of any outstanding or recurring bills, plus a list of any outstanding personal debts. (13) Where bills and records of payment are located. (14) Any large gifts that you have given in the past few years. The content of any letter of instructions will vary according to each individual's unique needs. The main goal is to help the executor and your beneficiaries as much as possible.

Make it a point to review your will on an annual basis. You should contact an attorney if you need to update your will or make revisions. DO NOT WRITE ON YOUR WILL OR TRY TO REVISE IT YOURSELF. Wills are important legal documents, care must be taken to insure the revisions are done properly.
